

Rising workloads and lack of resources hurting our principals

Schools need to be properly resourced to relieve rising principal stress level, the AEU said today.

The Australian Principal Occupational Health, Safety and Wellbeing Survey released today by Teachers Health Fund found that the main cause of stress was the “sheer quantity of administrative work” principals are required to perform, and the lack of time to focus on teaching and learning.

AEU Federal President Correna Haythorpe said school systems needed to do more to support principals and ensure all schools had the resources they needed for their students.

“This report paints a concerning picture of growing demands on principals, and rising levels of personal stress,” Ms Haythorpe said.

“Being a principal will always be a difficult and challenging job, but we can reduce some of this stress by making sure all schools have the resources they need.

“The AEU’s 2016 State of Our Schools Survey found that, 45 per cent of principals said their school is under-resourced or significantly under-resourced, and 48 per cent say they struggle to fill staff vacancies.

“Lifting resources will deliver better results for students, as well as reduce stress on educators.

“This is why we need the Turnbull Government to deliver the full six years of Gonski funding, rather than push ahead with its plan to stop $3.8 billion in extra resources going to schools.”

The Survey findings back up data from the Teaching and Learning International Survey (TALIS) from 2013 which found that 80 per cent of principals reported that inadequate resources impact on their effectiveness as a principal, while 79.8 per cent report that high workloads impacted on their effectiveness.

“Calls for greater autonomy for schools often ignore the fact that this puts increased responsibility and stress onto principals, unless they are also given more resources,” Ms Haythorpe said.

“The research also confirms that principals are being exposed to increasing levels of violent and bullying behaviour, and that this contributes to the stress of the job.

“As well as supporting principals exposed to violent behaviour, we need to make sure that schools have the resources for students to get the individual support and programs they need to reduce difficult behaviours.”

Ms Haythorpe said it was deeply concerning that less than 10 per cent of principals saw their primary support as coming from their employers or education departments.

“If we want teachers to put up their hands to become the next generation of principals, we need to make sure that principals are being supported.”

Authorised by Mary Franklyn, General Secretary, The State School Teachers' Union of W.A.

ABN 54 478 094 635 © 2025